

Frances Cabaniss Roberts Collection: Series 1, Subseries B, Box 27, Item 1

Merchandise account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 merchandise account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.

March 1836

Frances Cabaniss Roberts Collection: Series 1, Subseries B, Box 27, Item 1

Merchantile account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 mercantile account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.

Frances Cabaniss Roberts Collection: Series 1, Subseries B, Box 27, Item 1

Merchantile account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 mercantile account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.

Frances Cabaniss Roberts Collection: Series 1, Subseries B, Box 27, Item 1

Merchantile account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 mercantile account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.

Merchantile account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 mercantile account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.

372 TO THE SUMMIT OF MOUNT HOOD.

satisfied with the morning illuminations of the mountain. I knew the valleys were full of mists, and that the mellow light behind me was the forerunning ray of Old Sol's awakening. But the beautiful lights on Hood were enchanting. Now a faint, then a yellow glow, and finally, when the sun burst through, and tore, and scattered, and started to moving all the clouds and vapors, the glory of Hood was like streams of burnished gold, glittering in triumph. One after another, rocky crags changed, and gashed like jewels. The red burnt rim of Barrett's Spur shone like rubies. Soft ovals of firm snow were as mother-of-pearl, reflecting opal lights. Lower down protected ridges of hardy spruce, green and glittering in the early dew, were like emeralds molten and pouring down over the valleys.

CANYON IN THE NEW SNOW FIELD.

How we laughed at each other's appearance as we gathered at the climbers' breakfast. "What did the ladies wear?" Let me tell you. Over a complete suit of woollen underwear our gymnasium bloomers and blouse waists; two pairs of thick silk stockings, and heavy shoes with spiked soles; white sunbonnets and wood-lined kid gloves. The men were in all sorts of old clothes and sweaters. "Everyone," said Mr. Langille, with all the authority his office as guide of the day permitted, "everyone who expects to reach the summit of Mount Hood, come note and do his face as I do mine." He proceeded to apply a quantity of vaseline, and then a thick coating of gritty charcoal. "Not the ladies, too!" protested one fair blonde. "Yes, indeed, ladies most of all. But you needn't rub it so far into your hair, and your bonnets will protect your necks." The sun reflected on snow burns fearfully, and this repulsive cosmetic is as necessary for the face as we blue goggles for the eyes. The guide said that veils wouldn't do, because they were always blowing off, or freezing stiff, and then he added: "If you don't black, don't complain to me when your lips are cracked, your nose is burnt and your face swelled." At last came the start down the cañon. Up hill and down for a little distance through the cañon, then we were fairly on Cooper's Spur. From here we looked down into our first glacier. It is always an awful sight. The glaciers are icy rivers, and they are, too, the ungrateful children who tear and destroy with fearful force the very bosom of their mother mountain. As these glaciers, with their slow, relentless progress, and moraine upheavals, change all the landscape of mountain region, so, it is said, they will gradually wear away the mountain itself. But the Alaskan Muir only moves in its steepest portion about five feet a day, and it has taken the Elliot glacier on Hood many generations to scoop and throw up Cooper's Spur like a pile of earth beside a mighty grave. If we had entertained any earlier doubts, before we reached the top of Cooper's Spur we were persuaded that Rocky Mountain climbing was no joke. The hares were left at the spur, and for half a mile the path led over the backbone of the mountain, a steep ascent with the yawning crevasses of Elliot glacier on the right, and the larger Newton Clark on the left. This climb was the most exhausting of the whole ascent. There were loose rocks, too large to step over, with soft sand between pulling us in to our knees with every step. Besides, the wind was almost overpowering. It was easier for the ladies to creep along and drag their alpenstocks. After the utmost exertion we reached the adv field and crawled under the shelter of a rock for a bit of rest. We began to feel the altitude slightly, and one of the ladies returned from this point. But for the still determined ones, there was a stout rope fastening us together, in true Alpine style, about ten feet apart. Mr. Langille led, and turning his feet out sidewise stamped the inner edge of his heavy spiked shoes into the snow. We, following in the same steps, did likewise, and soon felt ourselves pretty good snow climbers. At first we easily made forty steps without stopping for breath, but the increasing angle of ascent, and the altitude, speedily made many less than that hard work. Ten steps would bring the heart throbbing right up into the throat, and a pull of the rope of the guide as a signal for "wind." First we rested standing, then sitting on alpenstocks thrust into the snow on a slant, the gallant men holding the free end. But when the muscles under the knee began to ache we dug our heels into the hard snow and leaned straight back against the mountain to stretch and relax, and prevent, if possible, "leg weariness," a set of cramp mountaineers' dread. Our path was continually steeper, with every step rubbing up against the icy mountain side. It did not seem as though we ever would get high enough even to see

376 TO THE SUMMIT OF MOUNT HOOD.

Just before we were ready to go down the clouds shifted and dispersed in great flocks, and all the world was spread out at our feet. But there was no time to wait and our good guide dropped us over the edge one at a time, holding fast to our waist-ropes until we reached foothold or an alpenstock below.

To go down the life-line it takes cool, steady nerve; after that there is not much that is serious in the descent. But you must understand that it is not pleasure unalloyed. You finally sit down and slide, but not on a sled or sledge or sking. The men never had better sport than coasting down that life-line path. In their heavy garments they were rather better prepared for this unexpected feature of the trip—but they towed us along willy-nilly. It was hard to keep our feet together, and one's poor back met all the sharp edges of frozen snow. We were tumbled this way and that with a shocking lack of dignity, and without a moment for even a protest. Sometimes we were on top; sometimes underneath that life-line, which we grasped frantically for dear life's sake; sometimes so twisted about that we were coasting backward with our feet up the mountain.

At the end of the snow we untied our good Alpine rope and left it under the rocks for the next climbers. Each for himself traveled again the backbone of the mountain. At Cooper's Spur, weary and bruised, we crawled to the broad backs of the horses, for the rest of the journey.

We made a rapid trip down the spar and across the snow-capped cañon, and here were our friends to meet us, and very soon appeared the inn.

It was now our privilege to write after our names on the register the significant word "Summit." It is never written lightly, or hastily, or indifferently. There is no mistaking the register of a successful climber.

There is a quaint little custom awarded a summit guest. A tack is put through your card and with a silver dollar to do the hammering it is tossed up and tacked to the heavy beams of the ceiling. The guide, kind to the last, tossed and deftly tacked my card for me, and so I had all the record evidence the inn permitted.

As the train stopped at Portland, and I climbed stidly down, one step at a time, the conductor said, "Oh! you made the mount; no use to ask that."

THE BELIEVER IN HIS LIBRARY.

FRANCIS JOSEPH—THE BELOVED MONARCH.
By CHARLES FRANK DUNAY.

NO royal house in Europe can equal the illustrious race of the Hapsburgs in the grandeur and romance of its historic past, the sad mystery of its present and the vast possibility of its future. No realm in Europe can vie in interest with the strangely compacted mosaic of nationalities which forms the heritage of that ancient dynasty. The Hapsburgs, who in the time of England's Tudor Kings ruled not only Austria, Hungary and Bohemia, but Central Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Spain and the Indies, have since then encountered a long series of disasters with noble fortitude; they have learned wisdom in the bitter school of misfortune, and to-day they hold a firmer place than ever in the affections of the heterogeneous multitudes that own their sway.

It will be fifty years next December since Francis Joseph I. ascended the throne of the Hapsburgs. He was a schoolboy then. He is a white-haired veteran now. And his realm has equally changed from being the very central citadel of old conservatism to being the foremost camp of advanced liberalism among the Continental monarchies. His reign began amid the throes of a would-be revolution, soon sternly repressed. To-day sees such of the two halves of his vast realm peacefully on the road to progress, far in advance of the wildest dreams of the men of 1848, the step in the initiative having been taken by none other than the Emperor himself. It has been a reign full of vicissitudes and full of strange contractions, with none more strange than that this apostolic king and firm believer in divine right should be the standard-bearer of universal suffrage, and that this most loyal son of the Church of Rome should raise his own hand to strike down that church's authority and to sever the bond that united it with the government.

of the simplicity and humanity of his character, when he begged that any memorial of the occasion should take a charitable form, then withdrew to pass the day in retirement with the Empress at Miramar. It is such indications of character as this that kindle the affections of a nation. There is scarcely a village throughout the empire in which a tree was not planted in honor of the day, and vast sums were devoted to charitable foundations. The great outburst of sympathy which views to his people and of his amiability of character.

"We are one family, one people," were his touching words to one of the deputations which, notwithstanding his great grief, he consented to receive. In view of these facts one is tempted to ask, can this be the sovereign against whom his whole people were in revolt some fifty years ago, the master of Windischgrätz, and Jellachich, and Haynau?

Perhaps the most important act in the followed the Meyerling tragedy is still fresh in our memories. In Hungary, and even in superstitious Tyrol, the people, in sympathy for their sovereign, compelled such of the priests as were unwilling to do so to celebrate requiem masses; and in Carinthia they threatened the Prince-Bishop of Ljubljana with violence if he would not permit the cathedral bells to be tolled. There is much of traditional devotion to the Hapsburgs in this; but still more there is recognition of the Emperor's great service to his people and of his amiability of character. It has been said that the match was forced upon him by his mother, but probably without truth. His mother intended that he should wed the Princess Helena, the eldest daughter of the Bavarian Duke Max, and, indeed, fully negotiated the match. Francis Joseph acquiesced in this arrangement with passive indifference, and set out for Duke Max's castle to consummate the formal betrothal. On his way through the park, before he reached the door of the castle, however, he saw strolling about his own family and among the nobility and the shrewdery a little girl whose extraordinary beauty fixed his attention, and won his heart. Within the hour he ascertained that she was Princess Elisabeth, a younger sister of his intended bride, and he canceled the engagement. His mother had made for him, and vowed that he would marry no one but the exquisite creature he had seen in the park. To this Maximilian soon gave his consent; nor did the Princess Helena greatly object, for she was far from being the Emperor's first choice. In Austria, however, the Emperor heard nothing but rumors of Princess Elisabeth was only the younger daughter of a penniless Duke, and was not by birth a "Royal Highness." To all this Francis Joseph was deaf. He was in love with the beautiful girl, and he would marry her. What was the use of being Emperor if he could not? So, in April, 1854, he was married. Mother and kinsfolk would scarcely recognize the wife, and the Viennese arist-toeracy held aloof from her. The fair dence. As a young man, with his clear, young Empress upon her part returned healthy complexion and elegant, aristocratic figure, he was remarkable even in former enemies with her comeliness—a land where these attributes are considered there is not one of them who would not long ago have given worlds to win her favor, and blot out the memory of those few years of spite and intrigue. One important result of this was the Emperor's complete emancipation from his mother's influence. Thus freed he presently became a liberal in politics, and even some things of which she was so proud.

FRANCIS JOSEPH IN HIS PRIVATE QUARTERS.

At Novara and elsewhere he showed such reverses, misfortunes and even extasies. Together won the great and employed would have been crushed.

ARCHDUCHESS STEPHANIE.

Francis Joseph has a frank, honest countenance that attracts and inspires confidence. In spite of the parliamentary fiction which has reduced him to the status of a constitutional sovereign and placed responsible ministers between him and the nation, the Emperor is still the direct adviser of all who wish to lay before him their private troubles and individual complaints. In the hour of distress and family tribulations, the most humble of his subjects says: "Let us go to the Emperor!" Since his accession to the throne, Francis Joseph has always set aside several hours of every Monday and Thursday to give audiences. The only formality required to be admitted into his presence is to inscribe one's name a few days previously at his private chancellerie, briefly stating the object of the so-called audience.

under a different régime. The political system alone was modified; the different component parts of the empire received liberal privileges; a complete reconciliation was effected with its most important portion, Hungary; but no change of ruler was suggested, so that at the present day, thanks to the infinite tact and perseverance inherent in the house of Hapsburg, the Emperor has achieved the apparently impossible result of making Austria, dispossessed of its Italian and German provinces, an empire so powerful that it hardly remembers the disasters of 1866. The Empress Elizabeth was once the loveliest woman of Europe, and is still remarkably handsome for her age. Since the death of her son she has sought succor from her gnawing pain in incessant traveling. Her restlessness and slight eccentricities, the outcome of her Bavarian blood,

Frances Cabaniss Roberts Collection: Series 1, Subseries B, Box 27, Item 1

Merchantile account ledger, 1836-1837 - Original 1836-1837 mercantile account ledger often covered over with pictures and newspaper accounts of poetry, news, and travel from the 1881-1889 era. Because of the 1865 practice letter with notations and the clipping from the Detroit 1889 National Editorial Association conference [with the name of Virginia misspelled as Virgea], this second layer was probably kept by Mary or Susannah Clay as young ladies with their management of the Huntsville Democrat.
