The tug-boat "Guntersville" backs slowly away from the dock at Hobbs Island into the middle of the broad Tennessee. The tug's horn blast a farewell to the diesel engine as the Guntersville starts the first leg of the riverboat railroad.

Rather than relocate many miles of track across several mountains in this Tennessee valley area, and span the Tennessee river with a bridge; the N. C. and St. L. 's riverboat railroad was inaugurated

It takes about four hours to travel the 22 miles and the scenery along the way is as pretty as any on N. C. and St. L.'s 1043 miles of track "To and from Dixieland."

For 60 years now this vital link has connected the farming districts of northern Alabama and southern Tennessee with the industrial area of the East.

The Alabama bell that summons help when tragedy strikes

THE CONCORD DEATH BELL

With all the struggle and conflict in the world today, we sometimes forget our neighbors.

In times past, in the small communities spread across this great land, the welfare of all depended on everyone working together for the common good.

Today, in a small rural community a few miles north of Huntsville, Ala. there's a country church and cemetery called Concord. In the cemetery a bell rest upon a wooden frame.

Whenever a death occurs in the community and there's a grave to be dug; someone rings the bell.

Out across the freshly plowed fields the bell's ringing sounds. A farmer stops and listens; then heads his tractor for Concord.

Down the road at Red Bay; several oldtimers sitting around, rise to their feet and walk slowly out of the store and up the road toward Concord

Yes ring the bell, and someone will come.
