70 BULLETIN OF THE UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN.

some few giving promise for a time of ultimate success, but most of them meeting with little or no real encouragement from the first—in spite of this there had been, when Congress took up the subject, a pretty constant agitation of the question throughout the whole preceding quarter century. During that time the American people as a whole must have contemplated more than once the possibility of new governments being set up in the West. Although the idea received a check when the back land was all claimed as within the legal limits of certain of the thirteen states, and it was not generally held that Congress had succeeded to the right of the crown to carve out new governments in the west at will, nevertheless the statesmen of the Revolution could hardly have come finally to the task of dealing with the west without remembering something of those attempts, and being influenced by the fact that until then there had been a widespread expectation that separate governments on a political equality with those of the sea-board, would in time be established beyond the mountains. It was another question which brought Congress to take its first action in favor of new states, but had that action not been taken at that time, and had the old states held on to the western land, it must have been recognized sooner or later, that the West had not gained its proportionate share in the liberty acquired by the Revolution, that concerning the local colonial governments which had been expected, the West had plainly lost by the Revolution. We may fairly say that the schemes for new western governments prior to congressional action on the subject, served as a not unimportant factor in ushering in that action.
