VALLEY LEAVES

Floors of the new courthouse. When the third jail on lot number fourteen had become too small, a site on Jefferson Street had been secured and a three-story brick building completed in 1929 at a cost of $81,000. Prisoners were transferred from this location to their new quarters on January 28, 1967.

The one part of the original courthouse complex no longer associated with Public Square was the market house. When the first courthouse was torn down, the public market was moved to the Holding Block east of the Square. In 1850, it was transferred to a site near the corner of Clinton and Washington Streets where it remained until 1911. Between this date and 1935, farmers once again marketed their produce in the parking area on all four sides of the Square; but in 1935, the county furnished farmers a covered market house near the Big Spring branch directly across from the present City Utilities Building. In 1963 this facility was moved to Cook Avenue, N. W. to make way for the relocation of a portion of Gallatin Street in the Heart of Huntsville Plan.

Although the courthouse lawn was newly landscaped in 1966, the historic markers and monuments were returned to their places to remind people of their heritage. Temporarily missing from his pedestal was the old confederate soldier who was undergoing repair after losing a battle with a demolition squad employed by the Huntsville Housing Authority. As the last brick wall on Cotton Row came thundering down, the crew accidentally let it crush the soldier as he stood on the lawn of the First National Bank awaiting his transfer back to his station on the Public Square.

Dedication of the fourth courthouse was set for March 5, 1967. At this time the cornerstone, containing items selected by the Huntsville Historical Society, was laid, speeches made, and refreshments served just as in September of 1911. Following the ceremonies, citizens of Madison County inspected their newest "Temple of Justice" located on the same Public Square that still served as the seat of county government for which it and the town of Twickenham, now Huntsville, had been created on July 5, 1810.

Today the Public Square has become largely a legal, financial, and professional center, and plans of the Central City Project will bring a further transformation of the area. In addition to the revitalization activities envisioned for the downtown business district, plans in this project include the construction of nine multi-deck parking structures, a mall around the three sides of the Public Square, a modernized street system, an International Big Spring Park, and new downtown shopping areas.

VALLEY LEAVES

valuable farming lands of that region had largely increased the slave population, which outnumbered the whites until the advent of a large white population of small farmers in New Madison, just before the land sales, restored the balance, so that, by the census of 1830, the white and slave population were nearly equal. In the year 1830, the anti-bellum population of the county attained its maximum, as, from reasons to be given hereafter, there was a decrease of over two thousand in our population from 1830 to 1840, and but little difference in that number up to the census of 1860.

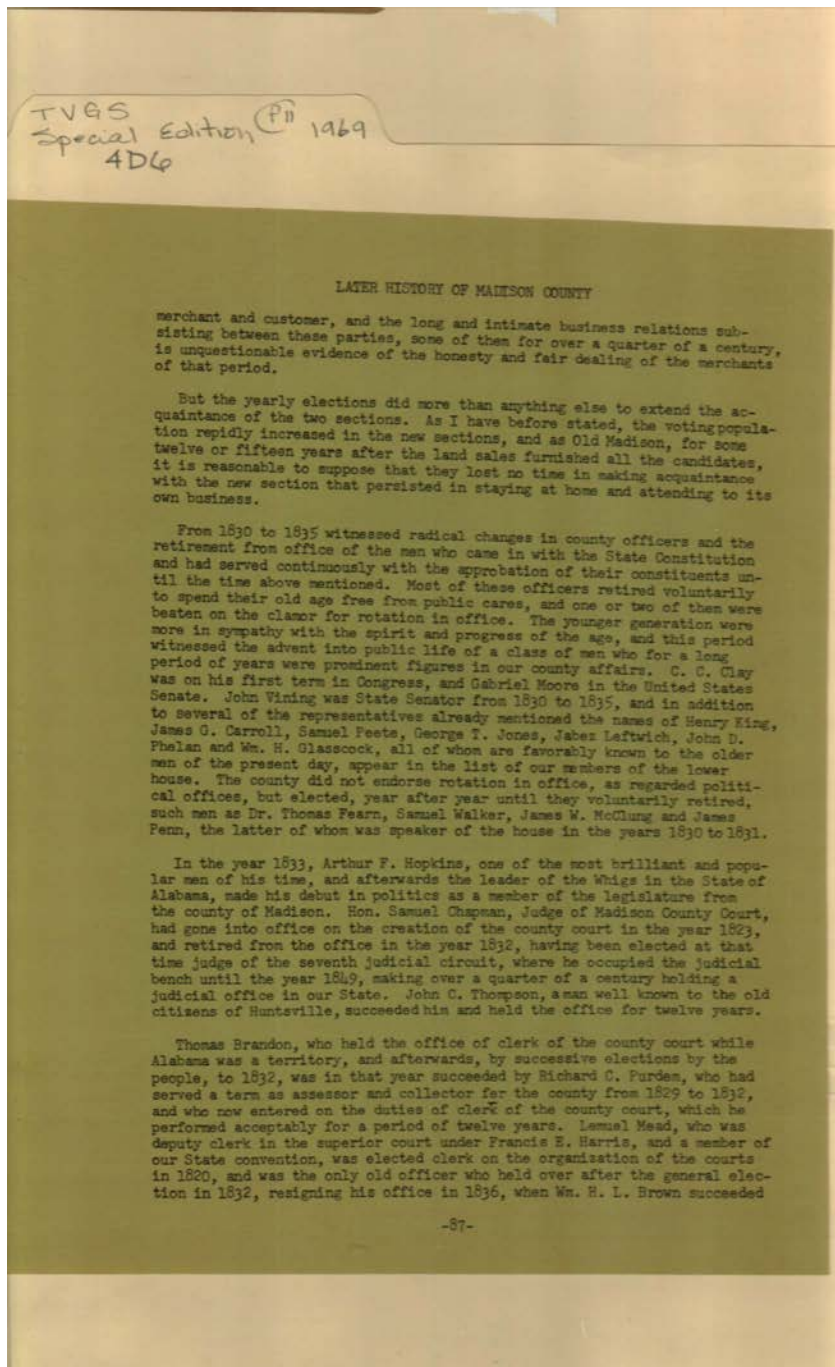

From the year 1830 all the lands in our present limits have been open to entry and settlement, and for many years after the land sales many of the best farming tracts in New Madison remained vacant. An act of congress had appropriated four hundred thousand acres of the unsold land in and adjoining the Tennessee valley to the State of Alabama, to be sold by the State and the proceeds applied to the opening of the Muscle Shoals. This land was sold in lots from twenty acres upwards, and the greater portion sold in Madison county under this act was purchased by speculators, as there was but little demand for this class of lands for purchasers. The swamp lands, as they were called, sold under this act, were generally in the river bottoms and covered with cane, and the portion purchased by land-owners generally consisted of small tracts adjoining their farm, to prevent future intrusion or for the timber where their original purchases included land, all of which was susceptible of profitable cultivation.

From the settlement of New Madison until the advent of railroads the intercourse between the people in the eastern and western portions of the county was restricted, and the greater portion of the trade of small farmers was with merchants in their own localities. There was but little cotton raised east of the mountains, and that little was generally bought by the country merchants, who either sent it to Nashville in wagons that returned laden with goods, or they consigned it to commission merchants, who advanced them money on it and sent it down Tennessee river to New Orleans, and, except those peddling to Huntsville, very few of our small farmers living at a distance from the county site ever had occasion to come here on business.

The roads across the mountains toward Maysville and the Big Cove were newly opened and rough and difficult in winter, and Flint river, without bridges, frequently interposed a serious obstacle to travel. There are many citizens of New Madison who now visit Huntsville every week, raised in the county, who, until they attained their majority, had not visited the county site half a dozen times.

The older portion of the county, occupied by opulent slave holders making cotton bales by hundreds, gave Huntsville its original prosperity, and while there is doubtless a great increase in the mercantile business of the town, yet it is of quite a different character from that of 1830 to 1840. At that time a large majority of our planters raised their supplies at home, and corn or meat was seldom if ever seen on sale at the stores. But luxury and extravagance among the wealthier classes became the order of the day, and the merchants found their profit in the sale of goods, wares and merchandise pertaining to well ordered households and to customers who did not haggle over prices but turned over their cotton to their merchants at the close of the year, with the simple direction "Take my account out of it and keep the rest until I call for it." In those days suspicion or distrust seldom arose between merchant and customer, and the long and intimate business relations subsisting between these parties, some of them for over a quarter of a century, is unquestionable evidence of the honesty and fair dealing of the merchants of that period.

But the yearly elections did more than anything else to extend the acquaintance of the two sections. As I have before stated, the voting population rapidly increased in the new sections, and as Old Madison, for some twelve or fifteen years after the land sales furnished all the candidates, it is reasonable to suppose that they lost no time in making acquaintance with the new section that persisted in staying at home and attending to its own business.

From 1830 to 1835 witnessed radical changes in county officers and the retirement from office of the men who came in with the State Constitution and had served continuously with the approbation of their constituents until the time above mentioned. Most of these officers retired voluntarily to spend their old age free from public cares, and one or two of them were beaten on the clamor for rotation in office. The younger generation were more in sympathy with the spirit and progress of the age, and this period witnessed the advent into public life of a class of men who for a long period of years were prominent figures in our county affairs. C. C. Clay was on his first term in Congress, and Gabriel Moore in the United States Senate. John Vining was State Senator from 1830 to 1835, and in addition to several of the representatives already mentioned the names of Henry King, James G. Carroll, Samuel Peete, George T. Jones, Jabez Leftwich, John D. Phelan and Wm. H. Glasscock, all of whom are favorably known to the elder men of the present day, appear in the list of our members of the lower house. The county did not endorse rotation in office, as regarded political offices, but elected, year after year until they voluntarily retired, such men as Dr. Thomas Fearn, Samuel Walker, James W. McClung and James Penn, the latter of whom was speaker of the house in the years 1830 to 1831.

In the year 1833, Arthur F. Hopkins, one of the most brilliant and popular men of his time, and afterwards the leader of the Whigs in the State of Alabama, made his debut in politics as a member of the legislature from the county of Madison. Hon. Samuel Chapman, Judge of Madison County Court, had gone into office on the creation of the county court in the year 1823, and retired from the office in the year 1832, having been elected at that time judge of the seventh judicial circuit, where he occupied the judicial bench until the year 1849, making over a quarter of a century holding a judicial office in our State. John C. Thompson, a man well known to the citizens of Huntsville, succeeded him and held the office for twelve years.

Thomas Brandon, who held the office of clerk of the county court while Alabama was a territory, and afterwards, by successive elections by the people, to 1832, was in that year succeeded by Richard C. Purden, who had served a term as assessor and collector for the county from 1829 to 1832, and who now entered on the duties of clerk of the county court, which he performed acceptably for a period of twelve years. Lemuel Mead, who was deputy clerk in the superior court under Francis E. Harris, and a member of our State convention, was elected clerk on the organization of the courts in 1820, and was the only old officer who held over after the general election in 1832, resigning his office in 1836, when Wm. H. L. Brown succeeded

VALLEY LEAVES

Major Fleming, James Neely, Jere Murphy and some others had built north of Holmes street, with no settlements south. The residence and the lots, negro quarters and outbuildings of Thomas and William Brandon were located near the junction of Jefferson and Holmes, and there was a burial ground a little north of this point, through which Jefferson street now extends, and it is probable that beneath this busy thoroughfare are the last resting-places of some of the forgotten dead of the early city.

Martin Miller lived in a substantial log house on the site of Mr. Well's present residence, and at the foot of the hill the old tan-yard was in successful operation, and through its openings there was a constant throng carrying in hides and returning loaded with the leather, that was distributed throughout the farms of the county and made into shoes by itinerant cobblers who traversed the county with their kit of tools and made up the shoes for the farmers. On a large number of these plantations they made shoes both for black and white, and there was but little difference in the style and finish of the work, except that the farmers laid in the leather for negro shoes of the russet shade, as it came from the tannery, and bought a side or two of finished black leather for the family supply.

The road to Whitesburg was much traveled, and in the winter season became almost impracticable, and outside of the old city limits there was not a hundred feet of macadamized road in the whole county.

The population of the city in 1830 was about two thousand, and the Methodists, Presbyterians and Primitive Baptists had erected houses of worship and were supported by large and liberal congregations. From the year 1830 to 1840, though embracing a period of great financial distress, yet was included a period of great improvement in the city and vicinity. The corporation extended one quarter of a mile from the court-house to each side of the 150 acres of land in its bounds, from which was excepted the negro quarter of Thomas and William Brandon on Holmes street, then called the western road. The old jail was built on the present jail lot in the year 1832, and the market house on the public square had been taken away and the market place removed to the Holding Block. The old brick court-house on the public square had become dilapidated and insecure, and after discussing ways and means for several years the commissioners finally let out the contract for the building of a new one. George Steele, a fine mechanic and a scientific architect, planned the building and drew up its specifications. Geo. Steele had come here from Virginia young and poor, but by his energy and mechanical skill contributed largely to the development of architectural taste among our people and soon made a wide reputation and acquired wealth. He married a daughter of Col. Matthew Weaver and raised a large family, among whom were the accomplished wife of the lamented General E. D. Tracy, Matthew W. Steele, the well-known architect, and Col. Jno. F. Steele, a celebrated civil engineer. But one of the men who constructed the court-house from corner-stone to minaret still lives in our midst, one of the last survivors of the celebrated mechanics of that era, whose finished and skilful workmanship gave both elegance and stability to our public and private edifices. Our fellow-citizen William Wilson and James Mitchell were awarded the entire contract, and broke ground for the new building in the month of July, 1836, and the first court was held in the new court-house in the fall of 1836. The excellent blue limestone of the foundation was quarried on Russell Hill. The whiter limestone of the steps into the hall and of the upper stone work was
